

Figure in N.Y. steroid probe found dead

by UPI

NEW YORK -- New York police said they believe suicide was involved in the death of a part owner of a New York drugstore implicated in a steroid investigation. John Rossi died Monday night of gunshot wounds to the chest and head but left a note that police said ruled out any criminal activity. Rossi, 56, was an owner of Lowen's Pharmacy, a Brooklyn store that was raided twice in recent months by agents who seized millions of dollars worth of steroids, The New York Times reported Tuesday. The newspaper said Lowen's was targeted by a multi-agency investigation into alleged major transactions involving steroids and human growth hormone. Some of the product was allegedly sold to New York City police officers. Rossi was never charged in the case, which was continuing.

Copyright © 2008, by United Press International. All Rights Reserved.

Figure in N.Y. steroid probe found dead by UPI