

Conn. high court rejects Buddhist temple

HARTFORD, Conn. - The Connecticut Supreme Court has ruled that a town zoning board did not engage in religious discrimination when it blocked a Cambodian Buddhist temple. The court's 45-page opinion, released Wednesday, hinged on a detailed analysis of federal and state laws, the Hartford Courant reported. The justices pointed out that Newtown officials had said they would welcome the proposed temple in a more suitable site than a residential neighborhood. The temple, if built, would be the first in the state. Pinith Mar, an engineer with the state Department of Transportation who left Cambodia as a child, told the newspaper last year that Cambodians are anxious to build a temple because the older generation, who grew up in Cambodia and fled the country in the 1970s, is dying off. "Time is running out," he said. "If they are gone, I have nowhere to go." The Cambodian Buddhist Society purchased 10 acres in Newtown. Residents of the area argued that the temple would bring traffic and noise to the neighborhood.
