

Umpqua Bank Compilation CD Celebrates Local Musicians

How about a side of music with that new checking account? That is what Umpqua Bank is serving up to customers. The largest independent community bank in the Pacific Northwest and Northern California released a new compilation album from its popular Discover Local Music project on July 11.

The album, titled Discover Local Music: Vol. 1: Sacramento to Seattle, offers a diverse mix of some of the West Coast's best music. It features songs by independent artists like Ohmega Watts, Rye Hollow, Stephanie Schneiderman and Bend's own, David Bowers.

"Umpqua is continuing to challenge the idea of what a bank can be by supporting local music and promoting shared experiences," said Ray Davis, Umpqua Bank CEO. "The talented artists in our Discover Local Music catalog live and work in our communities and we're honored to share this album with music lovers throughout the West Coast."

A CD launch party was held at the Century Street store in Bend on July 12. "We invited some key customers and music aficionados in the area," said Lani Hayward, EVP of creative strategies for Umpqua Bank. "It was more about sitting back and enjoying the music."

Hayward said the idea for the compilation CD came about when Paul Anthony, the CEO of Rumblefish, Inc. approached the company and asked, "What does your brand sound like?"

"That was a very interesting question and we thought about that for a little bit," she said. "As a community bank our sound is local and making a local music CD was a great way to highlight that."

Anthony, who refers to himself as the big fish at Rumblefish, Inc., says it also is a great way to expose people to the talented area artist. "We're showing local communities that there is world-class talent right in their own back yard," he said

"They are used to finding music in other places," he added. However, Anthony says when people pick up a CD like Discover Local Music, they are surprised by the high quality. He says some people start thinking, maybe I want to go out and check out the local music scene.

"When you buy this CD that money goes back into your community," Anthony said. "When you buy a U2 album, that money doesn't go back into your community. He points out that by supporting local artists, they will in turn feed that money back into local business. "The entire community wins," he added.

Hayward agrees, "So, anytime any songs are downloaded or bought in the store they (the artists) get paid so they continue to do more of what they love," she said. "The artists are getting 50 percent back on their song. It's just great."

This is not the first unique marketing campaign for the community bank. The bank has a record of trying new things. Rather than sterile, cold, office settings, Umpqua has created computer cafe/banking "stores." Who wants a stuffy desk, when there is a cozy chair?

Along with their local-branded sound, there is an Umpqua-branded coffee blend, served with a side of cookies that customers can kick back and enjoy while watching the big screen television on inviting leather couches.

The bank even holds social events, like the recent speaking engagement and book signing for Olympic snowboarder Chris Klug. They host yoga classes, movie nights and other community events totally unrelated to banking.

"There is a marketing element, but it goes beyond that," Hayward said. She says music is so innate to all of us. "There is an environmental effect that music can have. It is part of our everyday lives," she adds.
